But it gives the error that TypeError: the first argument must be a string or read-write buffer Here is my code: import requests import xml.etree.ElementTree as ET #This URL is from my textbook: #this is a file in my Dropbox where I want to save a DOM Document response = requests.get("") def toXML(tree): return etree.tostring(tree, encoding='utf8') with open('sc_1_complete.xml', 'wb') as output: output.write(toXML(response.content)) I'll appreciate any help. A: The raw response is already an XML document object. There is no need to convert it to a string using etree.tostring. I would simply write the XML to disk, either as a file or as a string with an appropriate encoding. from lxml import etree with open('sc_1_complete.xml', 'wb') as output: xml = etree.XML(ET.fromstring(response.content)) xml.write(output) Q: Preventing a user from writing to a file I have a simple.NET Winforms application and I want to prevent users from writing to specific text files. I figured that I would either use a FileShare or the FileStream.LockMode property. Since I want to create a number of these text files in my application, I only need to lock them down once. I created a small test application to experiment with this, but I have a very basic question - is locking all of these files via the FileStream.LockMode property secure enough, or is there a better way to protect my files? Here is my code: using System; using System.IO; class Program { static void Main(string[] args) { using (FileStream stream = new
