More infoYour audio chain is about more than just giving you the loudest sound possible, it should also be able to reproduce audio as faithfully as possible, whether it be audio from a DVD player, a Blu-ray player, a streaming source or any other device. That's where equipment from the likes of Denon, Marantz and Naim come in. The Echo 550 is an exception. It adds wireless connectivity that expands the Denon's audio player into a full-blown surround sound solution, but it also incorporates audio circuitry to improve the sound quality – Sonos Certified for wireless Play:1 and audio components that are designed to outdo most of the competition. The Echo 550 is available now for a suggested retail price of $399.99. It can be purchased from Denon and Denon dealers in North America and by co-branded retailers including Best Buy, The Carphone Warehouse, Dennis Audio, and Marantz.The start-ups approach helps a little I think the main problem with financial instruments as they stand now (i.e. the financial system in its present form) is that there is a lack of liquidity in the market. When cash is available then most traders will be content to just buy and hold their existing cash (if they don't need access to any other instrument). The problem is that after that point, almost no-one else is left in the market. Thus, liquidity is normally only abundant in times when no financial instrument is available. This is fine if you're selling a service to someone else or when you're selling assets (real estate) to someone else. But what happens when you want to buy something from someone else that they aren't selling? In that case, liquidity simply isn't available and people can't rely on the capital markets for their funding. As such,
