Policies can be made to run faster by making them more compact (by removing code and adding guards), or by making them more flexible (having fixed points where the control flow flattens out). Each policy has different tradeoffs. The fact that the compiler can transform some strategies but not others is a problem if you can't reason about the runtime behavior of the program. Third, I don't think that the type system of Go provides useful guarantees about when a critical section is being entered or exiting. In many real-world cases, such as services which receive multiple requests, it's imperative to be able to run this code in parallel. At best, the compiler could generate code that sets up a barrier at the start of the function and makes sure that it's taken down at the end. But that's not enough if those critical sections aren't actually being entered and exited in any particular order (i.e. you might be running the code in parallel, but with threads in lock-step).
